Those were the good old days... Coming of Age

By Melvin Van Domelen, Mountindale, OR

There are many traditions around the world that usher a boy into manhood. The Jewish boy has his Bar Mitzvah. The African boy goes out to hunt the wild animal. The Native American Indian youth goes to sit on a mountain, waiting for a vision. I would like to record my own introduction to this age.

One day Clarence Meek, a good neighbor, came and asked my Father if I could help him with his pea harvest. In the 1940s and well into the 1950s, garden peas were grown by contract for the cannery in Hillsboro. This was a cash crop for local farmers. Hundreds of acres of peas were grown in Washington County.

Clarence knew I had run a tractor and mower in my Father's pea field two days earlier. Clarence had a big field to cut and a better power mower. I could hardly sleep that night in anticipation.

The next day and into the night we cut pea vines like crazy. The big payoff came at lunch time. Eva Meek, Clarence's wife, had a wash stand set up in the back yard with a blue, chipped, enamel wash pan by the faucet, and towels hung on bushes.

There was always a lot of horseplay going on here. The snapping of towels, water being splashed, a flower being slipped into a back pocket.

To get a shake of a hand and a pat on the back and get to sit down for lunch with the men of the community is something I'll never forget. I'm fifteen years old, but I was accepted and could do a man's work. I was one of them.

It was a feeling something like the first time I voted or going on my first date.

This pea crop was planted as soon as the ground could be worked in February or early March. Peas are a 90 day crop and like cool weather. When the pea harvest began, it didn't stop and went on 24 hours a day. The only holdup would be if the fields were too wet to run the equipment.

In very early years, the pea vines were hand-loaded onto trucks by use of pitchforks. Then a hay loader was used, pulled behind a truck to elevate the vines to the back of the load. Two men on top of the load worked to spread the vines around and move them forward. This was a hard job. You were knee-deep in the vines. The truck is rolling from side to side, it's dark, and you are tired. I spent one night loading peas with John Meek, who had just returned from being a Japanese prisoner of war.

The machine that shelled the peas was called a "viner," and the pea viners were located off of Dennis Street in West Hillsboro. For every load of pea vines hauled into the viners, a load of thrashed vines needed to be hauled out. These left over vines made wonderful cattle feed and were worth $5.00 a load. Many loads went into farm silos.

Later on, my brother, Dale, had a new 1949 Chevrolet farm truck in which we hauled peas for other farmers. Dale drove all day, and I drove all night. We were paid $3.00 an hour, truck and driver. We thought we were really making money. Gasoline was around twenty cents a gallon. I remember getting drowsy around four in the morning. The solution for this was to stop, raise the truck hood, and grab a spark plug wire. The eyes would open after that.

We had a black cocker spaniel that rode with us and sometimes got us a job. A farmer would request that truck with the black dog.

Pictured is the farm truck we used to haul peas. Notice the rear of the side racks are angled off to fit under a hay loader. This photo may not copy well, but that cocker spaniel is by the front wheel.

I miss the harvest crews. I realize now that there are so few of us left who took part in them. If someone gave his word that he would help fill your silo, if he could walk, he would be there, no excuses. Filling a silo took a lot of help.

My father had a large three wire stationary hay baler that took nine men to operate. The neighborhood would show up with horses and wagons to feed the thrashing machine. Wood sawing in the fall brought the farmers together. One could hear that buzz saw sing a half mile away.

My mother always put out a good meal for these crews. Other neighborhood ladies would come in to help with this. If you were known for an outstanding meal, it was easier to line up a crew. I miss all of this but still always remember that lunch at Clarence and Eva Meek's with the neighborhood harvest crew.

A Note from Clean Water Services

Budget information and July 1 Rate Increase

Every year, from April through June, Clean Water Services goes through a budget process to establish rates for the following fiscal year. Public meeting notices are published in local newspapers, inviting the public to comment on proposed rates before the budget is adopted. Before any rate change, the District sends media releases to local newspapers and billing inserts to customers to notify customers of rate increases. Clean Water Services Board of Directors adopts the District's budget and rates.

Citizens can testify regarding the 2015-16 proposed budget and rates at upcoming public meetings. On May 8, 2015 (at the Clean Water Services Administration Building Complex 2550 SW Hillsboro Hwy, Hillsboro, OR 97123), the Budget Committee will consider the FY 2015-16 proposed budget and recommend it to the Board of Directors for adoption. Clean Water Services Board of Directors Public Hearing to Recommend Budget 10:00 a.m., Tuesday, June 16, at the Shirley Huffman Auditorium Public Services Building 155 N.
